PRACTICALITIES

Student presentations

All participants are expected to have read the pre-circulated papers in advance. At the seminar, students will be required to orally present elements relevant to a discussion of the submitted paper (10 minutes), as well as serve as a first opponent to a fellow student's paper (5 minutes). All students and lecturers are expected to participate in an ensuing open discussion (10 minutes) and the first opponent will chair the general discussion.

The course is focussed on discussion, intended to provide fresh perspectives on your research and to train seminar skills in an informal environment. Each paper has a limited time for presentation, which demands that your minutes should be used wisely. Do not simply read your paper aloud. Make a short, clear introduction of its main points, and focus on its connections to the themes of the course. By concentrating on the ideas and questions that you wish to discuss, you will receive better feedback from your opponent and from the other participants. There will be facilities for PowerPoint.

Please remember that the audience is qualified but not specialized in your field of research.
